

The military training which the New York policemen have undergone has been practical and severe. The squad in the picture are dragging a field gun under conditions such as would be encountered in real fighting. The vim with which the men go at it is worth noting.

Photograph copyright by Underwood & Underwood, New York.

Two regiments of police have been organized. New York has seen and admired them on parade. The men have olive drab uniforms and are completely equipped.

A lesson in skirmishing. The soldier policemen are taught the art of taking advantage of natural cover to conceal themselves from the foe.

A sham battle with the Stars and Stripes. The position of the men is shown.

Not exactly trench warfare, but something like it, and intended to prepare the men for actual service. Underwood & Underwood.

This picture was made at Fort Wadsworth, and the men might readily be taken for regular soldiers, but they are really policemen taking a course in military training. They would be available for service quickly.

Photos by Underwood & Underwood.

New York's mounted police would supply efficient cavalry in unfamiliar situations.

Photo by Underwood & Underwood.